It is a well-known fact that the American people are not properly educated in the principles of medicine and surgery. The average citizen is not able to distinguish between a good doctor and a bad one. This is due to the fact that the medical profession has not been able to keep pace with the progress of the world. The result is that the public is often misled and the patient is often injured.

The American Medical Association has been organized for the purpose of promoting the interests of the medical profession and the public. It has been successful in many of its efforts, but it has not been able to do so in all respects. The association has been unable to secure the recognition of the medical profession as a learned society. It has also been unable to secure the recognition of the medical profession as a body of experts. The result is that the public is often misled and the patient is often injured.
